Truecaller, an app that leverages technology for safety and security, has now come up with ways to authenticate visitors coming into office buildings.

The check-in process, which requires a one-time password, has been substituted with a one-tap sign in, which will check in the user inside the office, along with their name and phone number. This will make the process of checking into the offices hassle-free and more efficient, the company said at an event here, where it announced a tie-up with Vatika Business Centres. Nami Zarringhalam, co-founder, Truecaller, said: "It will not only be for business centres but will also be rolled out for residential centres."
